Dem Dr. Bader

Thank you so much for your letter of February 20 and the enclosed photographs and Xerox copies. The copy of your exhibition catalogue is still on its way and I am looking forward to its arrival. I am glad I could be of help.

Of the two photographs you sent me the Scene of witchcraft looks really exciting from the iconographical viewpoint! Unfortunately I am utterly ignorant in matters of sorcery — which does not keep me from making some wild guesses. Given the central position of a knife and dice plus the burning hand (!) on the floor, the subject may have to do with someone having been stabbed to death in a fight over a gambling row (gambling being considered as sinful in itself already). One might imagine that the victim's corpse is under the sheet. His wife, I venture, is entering from the left to have the witch (whose dress is clearly archaic, non-contemporary) and her aids conjure up his spirit. The monsters entering from the right (based entirely on 16th-century prototypes, see e.g. the fragment of a Temptation of S. Anthony, formerly attributed to Lucas van Leyden in the Brussels Museum) are bringing along a naked old manikin — what color is he: could he be the dead man's ghost?? I am just guessing, mind you!

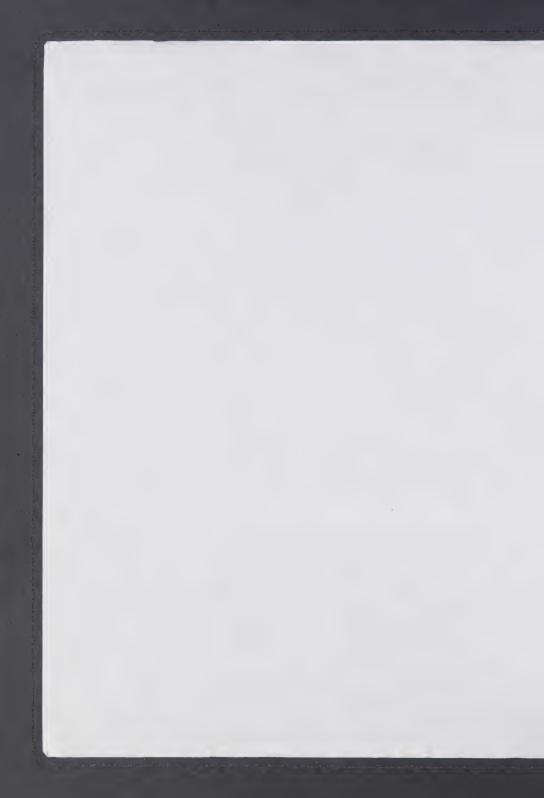

As to attribution, I am reminded of Abraham Diepraem but haven't enough comparative material at hand to verify that idea. The picture does seem to be by a Rotterdam artist (though not by Cornelis Saftleven) whose style was influenced by Brouwer rather than by Teniers.

The Judah and Tamar does not ring a bell with me. At first sight I thought of an 'Palianate painter such as Karel Dujardin but I don't arrive at any conclusive idea. There is something strangely academic or unimaginative about the execution; could it be a portrait painter's work?

With best regards, also for Mrs. Bader,

Yours,

Dear Alfred,

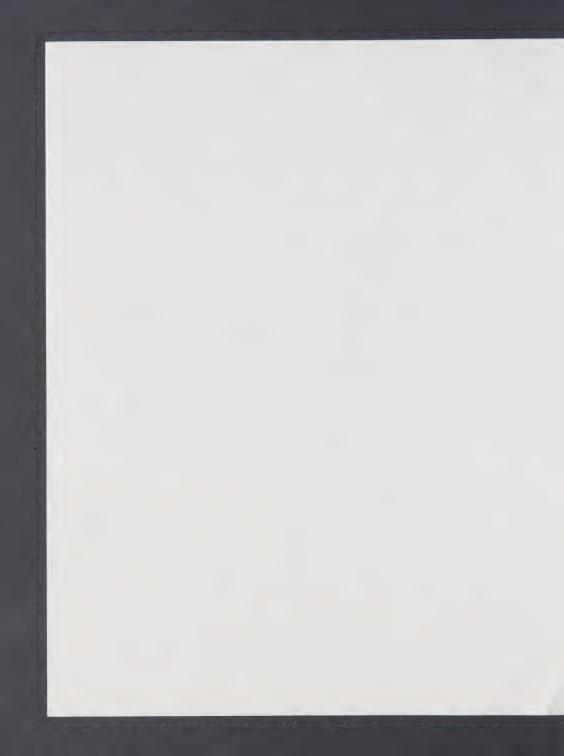

The trip that David McTavish planned to take out to Milwaukee was apparently postponed for a while into the future. This left the mail as a means to get your Ektachrome returned to you. No sudden inspiration revealed its attribution to me, unfortunately.

Hopefully the painter's name will someday surface. The construction of Judah's head is very confident and effective, and the painter achieved a strong psychological interaction between the two figures. An artist of this ability should not go unrecognized. Perhaps we already know this artist well, but see his style modified here to conform more to the style of the Lastman painting. The refined colour sensibility applied in the heads and hand and in the background gives way to the sharp juxtapositions of red, yellow and white in the fabrics. This is a vigorous work, and quite entertaining. Has an attribution been proposed for it?

Thanks again for bearing patiently with me in this "Case of the missing Ektachrome."

With best wishes,

White States
